Reflection

Child abuse is not a new social issue, neither is it a deviant or haphazard activity. It is deemed to be an accepted portion of our tradition. While domestic aggression is currently politically recognized as among the most pervasive and entrenched form of hostility within our society, issues of child abuse have yet to gain the same scope of consideration. This is in spite of the actuality that every year, thousands of kids, suffer sexually, physically, and psychologically as an effect of violence acts against them in the household.

Not startlingly, these problems have principally been considered a private issue. This, alongside the actuality that the family unit has conventionally been considered as a font of support and love, has resulted in a denial element at both an individual and community level. The family, however, as the most crucial institution in our community, is very intricate. It is both a body of social support and a body of social control, and that its interior dynamics may have both negative and physical impacts on relationships. Going to the source above, it is apparent that the issue of child abuse is conclusively tackled. As such, the data is sufficient to tackle this issue because the sources tend to handle the matter in different angles, and with a comprehensive level of analysis. However, it would be necessary to add more sources, which would complement and support the details of these sources.
