In Death of a Salesman by Arthur Miller, Willy Loman is a classic American man who is in pursuit of a dream, but this dream is what gets him caught in the tines of fate and suffers at the hands of his own self made end. An unstable mind leads to irrational thinking and on to irrational behavior in this novel. Yet although he strives for this American dream, he still cannot reach his goals, nor provide for his family. Willy Loman has a gift; he lies to his loved ones including himself, and tries for gold and fails.

Willy Loman is often overlooked as just a failure, he didn't make much money, and in the end he took his own life. However there IS more to this man than can ever be completely discussed. This man is a great man, who in many ways flies above the rest. He has two gifts, one gift is that he is good at working with his hands, a gift that he never realizes, and another one, he IS good at selling people words and ideas, like with his sons in high school, and his wife. The problem is that he uses his way with words to lie about his inadequacy as a salesman. He man who makes an appearance in the business world, the man who creates a personal interest, is the man who gets ahead. "Be liked and you will never want" (Miller 21) That is the problem, he is more concerned with using his way with words to sell the idea of his dream to his sons that he forgets that it is a useful strategy to sell products to customers. Although Willy may have gifts, he does have many flaws, his flaw is that he spent his life lying to himself and loved ones. He tells his wife that he makes more money than he goes, embellishes stories to his sons, and fills them with hot air.

He tells his sons that they look like Adonis. He spends more time constructing a web of lies about his life than trying to be real with people and use his gifts to construct a life where he can make a living. Ben, that funeral will be massive! They'll come from Maine, Massachusetts, Vermont, New Hampshire! All the old-timers with the strange license plates that boy will be thunderstruck, Ben, because he never realized I am known! Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey I am known, Ben, and he'll see it with his eyes once and for all (Miller 100).

When Wily has made the decision to end his life, he is still lying to himself, he is still embellishing his life to make it seem better, lying takes to a new level when it is self deceit. Lies are one of Will's greatest flaws, yet a great flaw suits a great man. Wily Loan is said to be the American dreamer, he can dream, but he never succeeds in meeting his goals. " you can't eat the orange and throw the peel away a man is not a piece of 61-62). Wily has become selves, like the peel of an orange; he is used up and done.

Here, Wily suggests that you cannot just use up a man and get rid Of him when he is Of no use " He's a man way out there in the blue, riding on a smile and a shoeshine. (Miller 111). Wily was a dreamer, there is no doubt about that, or his good intentions, everything about him said that, it said ambition, but his ambition was fed by false versions of the truth, or Willis truth, which was far from reality, even when he failed he could not see it. That is that led to the tragedy, his lies got unraveled, and his life fell apart.
