This is usually done by the Certified Financial Planner Boards (Brandon & Welch 2009). There are other twenty five organizations that apply the CFP to determine whether their financial planners are certified and are properly qualified to perform duties pertaining to financial planning. However, this process of certification is generally guided by the Principles set by the CFP Board of the United States, which is the only authority with the certification mark.

For an individual to access the Certificate of approval from the CFP Board, he/she must possess certain academic qualifications as required by this board for instance: He/she must possess a degree in matters related to financial management as well as accounting issues. Moreover, the degree must have been obtained from an ISO Certified and accredited learning institution. Chartered Financial Analyst Designation

This is a program offered to individuals focusing on financial analysis of various economic activities. It is usually offered by an American organization that was formerly referred as Investment Management & Research. In order to access this charter, an individual must complete the program offered by this organization (Lucas 2010). Such a person will therefore be referred as a Chartered Financial Analyst certificate holder. This charter certificate is not usually regarded as a degree but rather a program that enhances individuals' capacity to perform duties pertaining to financial analysis.

Apart from the fact that an individual has to attend the training programs offered to attain the charter certificate, he/she must also possess an experience of two years in regard to financial training and management.

Moreover, they must also pass the examinations offered by the CFA Institute.

There are various advantages that are associated with an individual accessing the charter certificate. To begin with, he/she acquires more knowledge and skills in regard to financial analysis and management from the training program offered by the CFA Institute (Lucas 2010).

The employability level of chartered financial analysts is also higher in the job market as compared to individuals without this charter. For example; individuals with this certificate have a higher chance of getting employed even in the European job industry as compared to financial analysts without this charter.
