Equated to other countries within the euro zone, the French economy has weathered the economic disaster comparatively well. Kept going partly by a low dependence on foreign trade and steady isolated consumption rates, France's Gross domestic product fell only in 2009 (Figure 1). Nevertheless, the retrieval has been somewhat sluggish and large redundancy rates, particularly in young people are more and more of concern to decision-makers. After the onset of the catastrophe, the economy deteriorated, and the state met numerous monetary tests. political tax returns have declined, and the buying control of customers has declined.

Legislators have attempted to revolutionise the economy; But, this has been a difficult course. The earlier Sarkozy administration turn out to be extremely disliked, somewhat because of its reform programme. Nevertheless, with a community budget shortfall above the EU average and little development estimates, the existing administration face the task of returning French community assets as well as inspiring economic development. In the peripheral sector, the bordering trading partner to France is Germany, that amounts for more than 17% of French exports and 19% of entire imports.

France's main exports are technology and transportation apparatus, aerospace gear and plastics, whereas main imports consist of technology, cars and oil. In addition, France is the most visited nation on the planet, making holiday business a key area of the French economy. The French economy is the fifth leading economy in the world and accounts for about one fifth of the gross domestic product (GDP) of the euro area.

Currently, services are the main contributor to the country's economy, with over 70% of GDP coming from this sector. In the manufacturing sector,
