Racial discrimination can be taken as a hurdle in the material and social progress needed by a country. Also, it has been taken into the observation that discrimination among minority groups and the groups which are considered as a majority leads to degradation of a country as a whole.

In order to understand this, Britain's example of racism can be considered that the groups which suffer the ultimate racial inequality are from minority groups outside Europe. These minority groups are diversified with respect to their culture, race, living standards, and their origination from different parts of the British colonial world due to which they experience many acts of disregard related to racial inequality. In order to make the situation better and to provide the minority with equal treatment, it is necessary to take some affirmative actions which can advance racial equality and prevent the people from injustice and cruelty (Mckenna).

The reason why affirmative actions are regarded as an effective source of solving the problem of racial inequality in the United States of America is that it provides the evolution of civil rights in different parts where there is a racial inequality issue. It can be considered to a great extent that affirmative actions are necessary to be taken in order to curb the problems of racism. This should be done so as to help a qualified person when he loses the opportunities of advancement in his life socially, politically, and economically. These actions will help him during the circumstances when he will be put back morally due to his race, gender, and socioeconomic status. Basically, affirmative actions are proposed to be taken as they can correct the effects of discrimination. the doors of equal treatment for everyone regardless of race, gender, color, or creed. Furthermore, this will help minorities in every direction. For instance, whether it is related to their field, their rights, and the opportunities for which they are looking (Mckenna).

Moreover, the reason for applying these actions is the uneven distribution of safety measures and effective institutions of democratic government. Many countries are trying to overcome the problem of racism by applying affirmative actions as they are of the view that these actions can advance racial equality and equality of opportunities among the people. For this, prominent examples include East African Asians, Indians, and Chinese who have made great progress in terms of providing self-employment and educational qualifications. They have tried their level best in order to curb the issue (Mckenna).

Similarly, in the United States, the Assistant Secretary who is appointed for the state and for the Western Hemisphere affairs in order to describe the above issue mentions that the policies proposed by the president of United States are related to the western hemisphere and focus on three priorities which sound critical to everyone usually. These priorities are related to the social and economic opportunity, safety, and strengthening of effective and successful institutions of the democratic government (Mckenna).

Conclusively, racial equality is an important thing to be considered as it provides the minority groups with equal opportunities in all areas of their lives.
