Family Nurse Practitioners at the University of Phoenix

The market value of graduate degree holders in the field of nursing has increased recently. The organizations have realized that family nurse practice is a challenging job and only fresh, dynamic and result oriented professionals can handle the responsibilities involved in the job. Hence, the demand for family Nurse Practitioners (FNP) has increased. FNP has the skill set to fulfill different health care needs of a family like health assessment, direct care, guidance, teaching and appropriate counseling at appropriate time. FNP has the ability to collaborate with family's primary care physician and other professionals within the health care systems. Hence, additional to providing the service in the conventional settings like office, clinic and emergency care centre, FNP can also help the families in variety of settings like school, home, work place, hospital etc. All these challenging aspects of the FNP's job have attracted me towards the profession. It won't be wrong if I say that I have a natural flair for this profession.

I was fortunate to grow up in a multicultural environment. It has made me fluent in second language, which has proven be a great asset in my professional life. My enthusiasm and excellent communication skills have given me an ability to carry out my responsibilities smoothly even under strong pressures of meeting difficult deadlines. An opportunity to study professional degree course of MSN/FNP in University Of Phoenix will enhance my communication and decision making skills multifold and will help me become a complete professional. Being a thorough professional will help me achieve my future goal of helping underprivileged families and individuals who lack health insurance. Hence, by getting a masters degree in Oncology

Nursing, I will be able to achieve personal growth and job satisfaction. I have a strong combination of ' knowledge' and ' experience' of FNP practice. My experience of working in a local county hospital and serving vulnerable and underprivileged patients has given me great satisfaction. I feel that there is a strong need to educate people on how to maintain a healthy life style in order to manage their diseases and to prevent future health problems. This not only will reduce the health problems of individuals but will also help in saving the community and national health budget. I am confident that with my abilities as FNP, I can help patients in curing their diseases as well as preventing their future health problems. My ultimate goal is to contribute in improving not only the life of an individual but also the economic condition of the nation. I can achieve it only if I get an opportunity to study in University Of Phoenix.
