Love and Lust is simply a part of an everyday American life. Rather its sensible love or unhealthy love, or simply lust. Some type of romantic play falls in line at one point or another. Americans can and will fight for love, and fight for who they'll love. In "A Farewell to arms", Lieutenant Frederic Henry is a young American ambulance driver serving within the Italian army throughout world war. Even after acquiring injuries, and ruined from WW1, lieutenant Henry can't keep his eyes off Catherine. Wouldn't one suppose with all that's on his everyday schedule as well as War, and injury? One may not have time for love. But No, being the American Frederic Henry is he is infatuated. Frederic says, "God is aware of I had not needed to fall in love with her. Therefore as an American, one may spend years and years, and spend hundreds of thousands of dollars simply to induce an education degree. Then get employment and work additional, for currency. In " The Great Gatsby", Tom and Daisy's movements are supported by their cash. At the start of the novel, they move to trendy East Egg, once on the move between " wherever individuals contend polo and were wealthy along," and are ready to terribly quickly obtain and leave at the end of the book after the murders, because of the protection their cash provides. It is in high demand because who wants to have a life based on the setting of Nickel and Dimed. In Alan Jackson's working-class song he uses a line " But there's nothing wrong with a hard hat and a hammer, Kind of glue that sticks this world together, Hands of steel and cradle of the Promised Land, God bless the working man". The promised land (America), is cradled by the working class. Which means without the working class America wouldn't be America. It would be a pile of a dump like the middle-east.
