China doesn't recognize Taiwan to be a country or a state, also tries to introduce their policy which is known as the "One China Policy" to represent the People's Republic of China (PRC) as the only one China in the world, and trying to have formal diplomatic relations with another country to show the world that there is only one China.

The "One China policy" is the strategy that insists both Taiwan and mainland China are inalienable parts of a single "China", an adjusted type of the "One China" policy known as the "1992 Accord" is the present approach of the PRC government, and now and again, the strategy of the ROC government, contingent upon which major political gathering is in control. Under this "accord", the two governments "concur" that there is just a single sovereign state covering both mainland China and Taiwan, yet differ about which of the two governments is the honest to goodness legislature of this state. In 1992, Taiwan and mainland China both concurred that there is just "one China," covering both places, however they settled on a truce about what that definitely implied. The policy implies that, essentially, nations must choose which territory represents "one China."

"Most nations have chosen Beijing, while also keeping up a few ties; specifically, Washington does not formally perceive Taipei, and authoritatively adheres to the one-China approach that says Beijing is the real legislature of all of China ("The one China policy," 2016). The "One China" strategy alludes to Beijing's position that Taiwan is a region of China (despite the fact that it holds democratic elections and is independently governed), and along these lines different nations can have formal discretionary relations with either China or Taiwan, yet not both; by contrast, if Taiwan tries to ignore and has formal diplomatic relations with another country by abuse this policy China would have various instruments available to its to hurt Taiwan—not simply military ones, but rather financial ones. That is on account of the island is more monetarily reliant on China than any time in recent memory (Horwitz, 2016).
