The speaker sees this as beauty and when he finds the metaphor imperfect, he retreats to using a poetic expression that immortalizes his love for this woman.

The speaker's debate is opened in this account to compare between his love and the seasons of summer, which in the real sense are roughed by the harsh winds that pass too quickly. I tend to believe that this love was to be eternal but by this comparison, a clear distinction is drawn as to the fact that this beauty would slowly fade away in time. Shakespeare imperatively gives nature a negative connotation and uses imagery and metaphor to exemplify the coming changes and endings. In essence, he insinuates that the world has a short-lived nature that will be subject to change within a prospect of time. He wrote that every fair from fair declines with a clear meaning that nature will change and its beauty decrease as in the instance of any beauty.
