their head are ruled by a small elite group, an oligarchy. They hold power by force and laws are made at the whim of the rulers. (Totalitarian government)subcategories of government Theocracya dictatorship which claims its authority comes from God and that they act under the direction of God. (Totalitarian government)Sometimes economic systems are confused with government types and though they are closely related to government types they are not synonymous. For example a constitutional monarchy may practice either socialism or free market economics. There are two major types of economic systemsFree-market and Controlled economiesSome of the several types of economies fit under the two major typetypes of economies Capitalisticindividuals retain all control and power and responsibility in this type of economy, with very little government involvement. (Free-market)types of economies SocialisticGovernment takes wealth from citizens by force in order to redistribute it to others for purposes such as education, health care, retirement funds, food banks, child care and so on. Government also regulates industries and standards heavily to meet the goals of the political elite. (Controlled economies)types of economies CommunisticGovernment owns the means of production and controls all the wealth. (Controlled economies)types of economies FascistGovernment controls the means of production, sets prices and quotas, while ownership ostensibly remains to the people, though the people have no power to buy, sell, or trade freely. (Controlled economies)types of economies MixedEconomies that contain elements of one or more of the above major systems. For example the United States is partially capitalist, partially socialist, and partially fascist in some sectors, leaning most heavily toward capitalism, but moving toward more controlled economies. (Controlled economies)
