

Internal colonialism assignment

ASSIGN BUSTER

Freedom is a huge theme with colonialism because colonialism is a huge oppressor of freedom. According to Doctor Lester Rigger the main factor with the colonialism is the lack in sovereignty, it's about separation and rule over others (wizard 1 10). Freedom was lacking when these communities of color were being crucified, and dictated by their oppressors. The notion of internal colonialism and systematic oppression stemmed from these communities and their disparities almost directly.

Home buyers of color are directed toward certain neighborhoods, interest rates are higher on loans, and racial profiling is practiced by law keepers. Other strategies were employed to detract from these individuals' rights. In response to these display reties momentous incidents and out-lashing rebuttals occurred in the face of the oppressors. Instead of unity among the American people it turned into Black Nationalism and raising up against a common enemy. The societal ideal of autonomy among the black people was a necessity.

The fact that their white oppressors were detracting from their lives, and crippling the people of our nation with segregation and discrimination was haunting for the ones taken a advantage of. According to the article systematic oppression was utilized by infiltrating minority groups, and almost by force encouraging assimilation. This systematic method is a perfect example for internal colonialism because the oppressors are trying to make their culture reflective, and at the same time force compliance with the intent to be unfit under their perils.

Through internal colonialism and systematic oppression we can see just how deeply authoritarianism affects our lives. The existential ethic that is selfless is a huge theme in our history with internal colonialism, and it's a huge motivating factor for the black man's upbringing in society. According to Jean-Paul Sartre "existence precedes essence" this means that we existing entities create our own being on our own values (Sartre 5). These ethics guarantee an individual's right to egalitarianism which is what the oppressed were striving for.

NO longer did activists want the IR people to languish under servility and inequality. They wanted radical freedom that is reflective of the Kantian perspective that our duties to ourselves include a sense of not allowing ourselves to be servile or exploited by others. The most extreme activists with these virtues were The Black Panthers who took an miscellaneous approach. Internal colonialism was fueled by the need for cheap labor in America. Yet the government requires a locus of control, unfortunately they used this control to exploit the minorities of the country.

According to Robert Blaug, American sociologist, in order to have control governments must actively participate to create such internal colonies, providing coercive force to control those who are colonized, while legitimating patterns of domination with laws. The best solution, according to Blaug, for racial and ethnic groups would be best served by rejecting attacks on their culture rejecting calls for assimilation, and promoting and maintaining their own set of values, and control of resources in their own communities.

A prime example of nonracial internal colonialism in today's society is banks and automobile companies that have sucked the economic life out of towns and CIA ties. Exploiting them to the fullest extent possible, and then when they are done a ND no more can be used, the banks and companies leave these areas and move elsewhere e in the world to exploit other people. This combination of greedy bankers and companies that offshore jobs has created not only a global economic crisis, but also a situation where half of the US population is now either impoverished or lonesome.

In comparison to previous internal colonialism greed is still an evident factor. A ultimate solution for these things is unclear. The United States is still not a place of equality for all. But in a recent March 18th speech Obama provides the American people with an answer. Martin Luther King Jr. , Malcolm X, and Other activists called their people to unite to take on one common enemy that is white supremacy. Now Years later Obama calls the American people to unite on one common ground d this round being unity and reconciliation.