Politics can be viewed as substantially a convention that is inextricably linked to diversification and conflict, but it can also be seen as a readiness to co-operate and act altogether. The ongoing lack of political participation in our society makes me curious . I am confident that after a certain time political participation has worsened because of our society losing the interest. Thus it is my desire to examine and study closely why the general political participation has deteriorated and who is to blame for consequences it had . It is one of the reasons I believe international relations with politics would be a good combination to study.

Studying international relations will enable me to combine subjects such as Politics which I have loved since being first introduced to Eurasian politics through my University teacher, who was a former politician. Conversations with her increased my interest for political world and issues taking place worldwide, starting from Why Democracy is associated with Victory And ending up with the Determinants of Nuclear Proliferation. Being an enthusiastic and highly motivated student I would love to get to know and undergo the challenges which such a prestigious course would provide me. Studying Political and social science at University strengthened my appreciation for these subjects. I comprehend that disciplines are related to each other , in particular when concerned with well-being of our society. International Relations examine the relationship between nations and policies that are developed. What I pursue to investigate is not just how the policies are formed but the moral and the principles behind them and why they are successful or unsuccessful in society.

Studying sociology at the University has allowed me to look at the sociological view of international relations and also compare any theories and political ideologies. My study of Intercultural communication with media at the second term has enabled me to evolve the analytical skills required to fully comprehend complicated texts and has given me the knowledge of the influence of media in politics and the importance for politicians having media on their side. My passion for these subjects goes beyond an academic aspect. I am keen on reading books such as “The Globalization of World Politics”, this will help me to broaden my knowledge of international relations and to what extent its effects are seen in modern society. I often attend University debates held in Almaty and other regions of Kazakhstan, these have expanded my knowledge on topics ranging from political ideologies to international policies, all of which I have found extremely useful. Being a part of “ThinkOutside” debating group, I represented my school on a various debating topics, having obtained successful results.

Last year I travelled to Samarkand where I had an insight into the culture and tradition of the native-born people, this expanded my political and cultural knowledge and also underlined the importance of family structure. Having visited various countries and learning about their structure of policies and to what extent it helps their society has inspired me to chase a career in international relations and politics. It's my desire to learn new political and international approaches and analysis which will give me the proper foundations and broaden my knowledge. The above-mentioned reasons lead my will to study politics and international relations; I believe it will give me the confidence that will make me better to deal with high demand this course requires. Being a part of school council ultimately inspired my drive for debating in which I represented my debating group at competitions held on national level.

Eventually , I am proud of my ability to combine both study and a school life successfully.
