

Essay on why i want to be a police officer

Law, Security

Since when I was a young boy, I have admired the role of police officers. I have always being attracted by the sirens and lights that flash out of police cars. The status quo of police officers has compelled me to focus on this field since police officers can enter any building and are legally allowed to carry guns. This ensures that they are protected and armed throughout.

Protection of the other people and solving criminal cases in society is one of major goals. I have discovered that being a police officer would be the only way I would be able to achieve this goal. This is because police are tasked with the role of crime prevention and ensuring security of the public members.

As a teenager, I experienced a criminal activity, which resulted in abuse of human rights. At this moment, I thought I was a police officer to save the victims. I want to join this force to accord security to my family, friends, community, and nation. When I see police officers deterring crimes, ensuring security and safety, and solving social issues, I feel proud of them. As such, I want to provide more support to this force by increasing their numbers.

However, I believe that police force has not attained the desired change of ensuring that adequate police officers are available to ensure community security. This compels me to join the force to increase their numbers. I am also ambitious of being a respectable and reputable police officer.
