Nines Marketing techniques for apple and Nikkei By alveolar update themselves timely product differentiation, new branding and line extension. The marketing has helped understand customer trends that have different nationalities, genders, cultures, and ages. To enable this, Nikkei introduces its latest products through a marketingcommunicationgroup that can strengthen the " positioning of, and key messages about, the Nikkei brand," through different forms of visual aids and point-of-purchase advertising.

Nikkei keep ahead of the competition by appealing to the masses and always staying in time with what people seem to like for example running shoes are on a rise and appeal more to girls so Nikkei take that and try to appeal to them even more and lots of boys are into football boots so Nikkei focus on that at the moment as well. Marketing has helped Nikkei communicate effectively with consumers because Nikkei has always recruited top performance athletes from all over the world with strong personalities consistent with the brand values.

For instance, Michael Jordan started appearing in swoosh campaigns at the rise of his basketballcareer, in 1987, and so did Dennis Roadman and Charles Barley. High performance athletes have always been role models with extreme power over their audience (mainly teenagers and young people) often influencing them into buying products not otherwise thought of.
