Education functions as a keystone in modifying and uplifting the society.

The core values an educationist should possess include excellence, truthfulness, dignity, empathy and student focus. A teacher, a facilitator, can play an important role in nurturing these positive aspects in a student. To me a teacher should be a pillar of strength, motivation and guidance.

I teach Physics to a group of students of mixed abilities in the senior secondary level. My primary aim is to instill and nurture an interest in the subject. I keep in mind a child centric approach while planning the lessons and try to make it enjoyable so as to foster learning.

The academic performance of my students is my responsibility. In order to improve that I resort to different constructive methodologies of teaching. I adopt differential teaching and learning in my classroom with a plethora of activities. Different methods of assessment will help me analyse the academic progress of students.

This gives the confidence to zero in on methodologies that worked well or helps me change the techniques of teaching. I strongly believe in the role of a teacher as a facilitator or guide. The teaching- learning process should not be dominated by the teacher. Rather, the teacher should be instrumental in constructing situations which will turn out beneficial for students to develop critical thinking and a rationalised approach. A classroom should be a positive place to learn, imbibe and grow. For this, there should be an environment of mutual respect between the teacher and the students. It is likely that all students may not agree with me on certain points.

This often triggers a productive discussion where I respect their view points. To ascertain these points, I draw my values from 'Social reconstruction' approach. I acknowledge the positives of cultural transmission as the knowledge and wisdom accumulated over the years need to be transmitted. Though I won't agree with all the insights highlighted by 'GNP code', a well-trained and motivated workforce is essential for the upliftment of any country.

So I try steering the thoughts of my students in a direction that will help them choose a career path which turns out to be beneficial for the society.
