John Russon believes that through the essence of sex; self presentation and other reception can inhibit it in its most profound state. How the concepts of self expression and awareness characterize this “ sphere of of self presentation and of other-reception” (111). Russon explains that everything we humans experience in life is distributed through our own personal sexuality. He connects language and sexuality through communication and expression. How “ Language, as the development of our sexuality, is the most profound sphere of self-presentation, of self-expression” (113).

We use our language to express our own sexuality to our partners or the others around us. This creates a sort of bond or form of relationship with that other. Because language is the development of sexuality, it is the communication of our being with others that we embrace into a reciprocated bond. What Russon is trying to convey is through expression and language that we as people bear the power of our own self-image. Through communication, personal actions and self-expression do we fully connect our own language to sexuality in and around us.

The expression of language that has developed into our own sexuality shows different emotions and feelings towards a significant other. During this stage, our communication factors and actions change accordingly. In existence of neurosis in language, we must consider the altercations of communication among others; whether it is through speaking or writing. Russon interpretes expression through sexuality as sort of a mind and/or physical altering “ intersubjective reality” (113).

We use what we know and do in reality and incorporate it into expression for someone else. This language creates an expression that we must consider and use under our own communicative custom. Speaking and writing is how we take our own reality and express it to another. “ Speaking and writing are the most fully developed aspects of our language, but language itself is the broader phenomenon of our entire gestural bearing towards others” (114). We see speaking and writing as expressions articulated through emotions, thoughts and voice.

Russon expressed language as a sexual phenomenon through that our language do we become closer to another and that we create an everlasting bond between ourselves and that other. Russon was able to create the development of sexuality through language and expression. He connected our communication from one person to another to convey the idea that language of expression can come in different forms, but it takes self presentation and other reception to generate that sphere through sexuality.
