

Today's more often criticized because their thick accent

Today's United State of America is a multicultural melting pot comprised of many bilingual individuals.

We're comprised of a diverse group of immigrants whose words choices reflect their social heritage. Many of these individuals face abuse due to the absence of acceptable or effective vocabulary. The presence of abuse can make someone dependent on others, especially their children.

That's how these kids under the pressure or embarrassment take the autonomy of their parents away " I was a teenager, she used to have me call people in the phone and pretend I was she" (Tan, 2006). Tan's give an overview of those how has English as second language, face the social consequences of stereotype and discrimination " I have described it to people as " broken" or " fracture" English" (Tan, 2006). For native English speakers, it is too difficult to appreciate languages because if all your life you have spoken only one language in this case English and you never had the change to grow up with another culture, the only life you will know is thought that language. Language is another way people can critique you and judge you in some way. Immigrants are more often criticized because their thick accent however, there are more susceptible to being abused and ignored by others (Tan, 2006). Our society take advantages of these kind of people in a way to drag them to be uncomfortable with their second language learned " My mother has long realized the limitation of her English" (Tan, 2006). Tan's goal in " Mother Tongue" is demonstrate discrimination and stereotype against immigrant's due to the language barrier can cause a lack in confidences.

Tan also points out that these barricades can cause an individual to have to be dependent on someone else to communicate for you " I was forced to ask for information or even to complain and yell at people who had been rude to her" (Tan, 2006). Stereotype is always simplified, and standardized conception or image invested with special meaning and help common by members of a group (Dictionary. com).

By this definition we could see how other people can have a misconception of immigrants. For example, Tan has described how Asian-American students go to the engineering program rather than English. Teacher had the assumption that Asian-American students were better in math and science due to the higher score they achieve in the academic test such as SAT and IQ (Tan, 2006). Tan's article she mentions that educators had pointed this kind of student to major in those academic careers rather than their own choice (Tan, 2006). Language become part of stereotype is because you could define how you are as individuals and how we think about ourselves. When stereotyping occurs it's the consequences of prejudgments from certain ethnic group " I happen to be rebellious and enjoy the challenge of disproving assumptions made about me" (Tan, 2006).

I believe the misconception towards immigrants is happening more often than what we think, as humans we assume that someone with " limited" English is not intelligent enough to be part of our society that's not true " I believed that her English reflected the quality of what she had to say" (Tan, 2006). Tan describes that her mother was very clever. She was able to read several articles and books. Such as Forbes report, the Wall Street week, that make me think that someone who can read such report she has to be smart.

Someone like that has a lot to offer and say (Tan, 2006). Often people treat others with a certain level of cruelty and violent manner which can include insulting and offensive words. Often Americans believe this kind of people they come to United States or any other country take their jobs and whatever the country could offer. There are examples provided by Tan in the article that describe how immigrants could be abused or mistreated in different places and occasions "the fact that people in department stores, at banks, and in restaurants did not take her seriously, did not give her good service" (Tan, 2006).

Tan's mother felt less than and emotionally damaged because her "limited" English was not as effective as others. It's not necessary for you to hit someone in their face to delegate that you are abusing that person. Inclusive an emotional abuse is a more complex abuse, when you are pushing someone to the edge emotionally that could provoke a human with psychology disorders. That's going to make Tan's mother in certain points with an emotional damage, she felt less because her "limited" English was good to communicate but not effective for others "Yet some of my friends tell me they understand fifty percent of what my mother says, some say they understand eighty to ninety percent as she was speaking pure Chinese" (Tan, 2006).

Discrimination is the prejudgment to treat others differently on the ground of race, age and sex (Merriam-webster.com). The accent discrimination is more frequently used when an individual with a certain accent, for the example, a Mexican accent, is more discriminated in workplace and in a social environment. Other accents are considered more acceptable than others. Tan describes the disappointment she felt when negative feedbacks were given <https://assignbuster.com/todays-more-often-criticized-because-their-thick-accent/> towards her mother “ But they seem just as bad as if everything is limited including people’s perception of limited English speaker” (Tan, 2006).

Negative comments have impact her mother’s life in a point that had to depend of her daughter “ One time it was a call to her stockbroker in New York” (Tan, 2006). The reason people have mistreated and disrespect her mother in such a way is because she learns to speak a variation of the English, a differential from us, we must go to school to learn how to speak properly. She learns what a like to call a survival English. Part of the immigrants from United States of America there are brought here as a child by their parents to be provided with a better future something that probably could be given in their native country. They came to United States to live the American dream.

Something that people sometimes take the time to judge without knowing how they suffer in their country, with no opportunity to get a decent job or send their kids to a decent school. How sad that we take the time to see what these people are doing with their life, but where are not doing anything to change the world. These immigrants have an extend accent because most of these people go home and still talking in their native language that how make us beautiful and different “ it become our language of intimacy, a different sort of English that relates to family talk, the language I grew up with” (Tan, 2006). The sad part is discrimination towards the thick accent due to immigration is not the only negative for our society, the divulged racial blemishes and negative remarks are also made by race and skin color. Tan’s mother was experiencing discrimination and unfortunately, she is not alone.

In conclusion, not only Tan states how well educated we could become or <https://assignbuster.com/todays-more-often-criticized-because-their-thick-accent/> how we could master a language or either how much English language we are able to use "I am fascinated by language in daily life" (Tan, 2006). Is there something we are still missing? People could be highly concerned for our society and impact of the increase due to the discrimination and immigration for the past couple years.

Tan's mother was battling to find her identity, to find who she was. At one point, she gave that power of her identity to her daughter. "When I was fifteen, she used to have me call people on the phone pretending I was her" (Tan, 2006). She did this because she started noticing her lack for a proper English (Tan, 2006), and how her life was around of people they don't appreciate, how well she was doing to adapt a new culture as her own. Therefore, we could ask ourselves if someone is highly educated tends to be less likely to discriminate if they have been educated. I start thinking how much I doubt it because the primary child education should start in home with their parents.

Teach them how to respect others and not to be afraid of learning any new culture. Regardless if you are rich or poor, you could be sent to Harvard but that does not make you a better person, that's going to make you more educated. I think discrimination is something learned in home by our parents. We have to realize that we become our language; even our body has his own way to tell what he need. The United State of America has been built from different cultures and language for the past centuries. As an American I would to tell you to embrace those how are different.

We must educate ourselves to new customs. That's going to make USA most likely to be more united and without any stereotyping, discrimination is going to make us stronger as a nation. The lack of understanding prejudices including racism is killing our nation and split in two.

We should do something to change it. Regardless how her mother was treated, Tan was able to overcome the language barrier and perhaps give her enough motivation to push herself to succeed when her mother understood what was being said in the book signing "so easy to read" (Tan, 2006).
