With globalization and the strides made with computers, the Industrial Relations field has become very complex. But when you cut all that away, you still have the basic players: industry, labor and the government of whatever country is home to that company. And the goals, though more complex as well, are the same as they were at the dawn of the Industrial Revolution: the maintenance of good relations between labor and management. With few exceptions, employers can both hire and fire workers. They can also adapt to the latest technologies without the workers' approval, even though it may result in a diminished workforce. It can also consolidate its operation into another entity, relocate and merge with others without labor approval. Labor The labor-force should always look for improvements in their working conditions and the terms of their employment. Where possible, they are empowered to share decisions with management as well as make their grievances known. They also can form unions to represent them.

Those unions have the tacit approval of workers that even the playing field in their negotiations. Sponsored Links Competitor Analysis Competitive Intelligence research.
