How the doctrine of duty of care and failure to protect leads to police liability

The scope of police duties of care remains an equivocal topic across various settings all around the globe. Worth noting is the fact that the doctrine of duty postulates that public officers such as police officers have a moral obligation to serve for the best interest of the society. Based on the fact that police officers take an oath to serve and protect, they are instilled with principles aligned with integrity, selflessness, and honor. However, there are various ways in which this doctrine results in police liability. More importantly, failure of police to respond to emergency calls requiring police assistance makes them liable for the outcomes of such emergencies (Rogers & Lewis, 2013). In addition, failure of police officers to carry out adequate investigations that would allow for provision of justice to victims and offenders as postulated by this doctrine makes them liable. Overall, this doctrine gives additional duty to police officers, which makes them liable for the mishaps related to their duties.
