In the 1980s, a school of neoliberalism or structural liberalism emerged that continues classical liberalism, but takes into account the new realities of the world political process: complex interdependence, developing interstate cooperation, integration, the creation of a global community. Neoliberalism pays special attention to the interconnection of politics and the economy. Due to the interdependence of states, the opportunities for their cooperation through international organizations should increase, and the influence of anarchy on the international environment should be weakened. Within the framework of neo-liberalism, several trends and concepts have emerged, which are sometimes viewed as independent concept schools.

Among them is the concept of complex interdependence. According to the theory of interdependence, all political actors have a greater or lesser impact in international politics. They are interested not only in economic cooperation, but also in uniting efforts to solve common, global problems, for example, environmental protection, arms limitation, non-proliferation of nuclear weapons, etc.

The situation of any country depends on its relations with other states and on the international system as a whole. Due to the growing interdependence of different countries, the delimitation of the state's domestic and foreign policy becomes more and more relative: not only does foreign policy depend on the internal, but also internal from the external, and increasingly. The multilateral dependence of states makes the conflict resolution of power unprofitable, while cooperation is to create conditions for peace and prosperity, the transnationalists assert. The difference between neo-liberals lies in the fact that, they do not only strengthen this position, but also make it the starting point for a new, understanding of security.

The post-Cold War opportunities for communication, the spread of democracy, new scientific achievements are accompanied by increased threats due to the loss of the former and the absence of new levers for regulating the world order. Disorder and disasters, poverty of a huge mass of people, ethnic conflicts, environmental degradation all this and much more, in their opinion, forms the beginning of “ future anarchy”, requires an immediate response from the world community and highlights the problem of creating a new security system. The concept of cooperative security is most suitable for solving problems facing the world community, in the opinion of neo-liberals.
