Many individuals esteem books for the conceivable learning they contain. Be that as it may, German philosopher Arthur Schopenhauer accepts something unique. In this section, he contends that by reading books, people are ruining their minds with remote musings. Furthermore, he contends that reading obliges a man's own particular musings and convictions. While many would concur and say that reading corrupts the individual considerations and convictions of people, reading really grows and assembles information, therefore, making individuals make their own particular contemplations. Starting with the Salem Witch Trials, many people trusted the stories they read about witches. Before long, after this thought was planted into their brains, individuals started hanging everyone around them and even dogs they accepted to be witches, all in light of what they read.

These individuals were immediately ruined by remote musings fundamentally making them make a move without reason. Along these lines, for this situation, reading really had a hurtful impact since it influenced individuals to imagine that witches really existed. Due to the "brainwashing" impact the books had, individuals lost their lives because of the debasement musings planted in individuals' minds. However, reading doesn't have a negative and potentially "brainwashing" impact on its readers. When one understands, it doesn't "rob the mind of elasticity". Reading pieces on new subjects can illuminate the public's mind and how others think and feel. This can open the mind further to new thoughts and feelings.

Unexpectedly, Schopenhauer loathes reading and discovers it a terrible craftsmanship when his sentiments towards reading are expected to be read, and planned to animate the mind of its readers, something he guarantees books don't do. In case a man depends on simply his contemplations to learn and develop, he will go no place. Only one out of every odd man has the chance to encounter life and gain from his environment, and books educate the individuals who can't. Thus, reading does not smother the mind. It widens it. Schopenhauer utilized a quote by Pope Dunsiun III: "Forever reading, never to be read."

"This statement dishonestly implies that man who encircles himself with books, at that point writes his own, will come up short. When one reads, they learn not just the certainties and information in the books yet the system and style of the writer. Their vocabulary extends and they can create methods for writing admirably. Their works have a more prominent possibility of being read than a typical man, who written a work construct exclusively with respect to his thoughts. That man may have less information of creating and in this way, a less engaging work. When one writes, they create art, meant to be enjoyed by many.

If one achieves writing well then they should share their art and enjoyed by the world. Reading a written work shows appreciation for it and gives its ideas a chance. By doing this, one expands their mind and their capacity for intelligent thought. Reading does not create fools out of men, nor does it suppress men. In truth, reading broadens the mind, engages new thoughts, shares knowledge, and creates an appreciation for the written word.
