

In their heads. they all are very

In chapter 13, the remaining five that are alive, sit and think in their heads. They all are very frightened and they do not talk to each other.

Only Lombard's senses are heightened with his ears picking up the smallest sound and his step was quicker and lighter. It was all quiet until Armstrong asked everyone if they should do something instead of sitting like lighting a bonfire, but the idea was quickly diminished because of the weather outside. Then, they all go to the drawing room.

They sit in silence again and ate lunch. Lunch consisted of canned foods and the remaining five all ate standing round the kitchen table. After lunch, they all "herded" up and went to sit some more in the drawing room.

All of them were still very extremely paranoid, sitting still in silence, thinking in their heads that the killer is sitting with them. Then, the bell struck five and all of them jumped up. When the bell struck five, Vera asked if anyone wanted tea. Blore said he wanted a cup, but Wargrave said that they all would like to see her make tea, the sense was implied that Wargrave didn't trust her. So all of them went to the kitchen and watched Vera make tea.

Only Vera and Blore drink the tea and the other three drink whiskey. After they finish their drinks, they all go back to the drawing room. When Lombard switches on the switch, there is no electricity because Rogers did not go to the generator.

Lombard goes and comes back with candles and they light five of them. At twenty past six, Vera goes and takes a shower. When she enters the bathroom, she smells the ocean and she has a flashback about Hugo.

Then, as she stood there she felt a clammy "hand" touch her throat. She screams and all the men come up except for Wargrave. They all figure out that it was just a long and thick piece of seaweed. Then they all look for Wargrave since the men all thought that he came up with them. They finally find Wargrave in the drawing room, but he is dead from a shot to the head with the revolver.