

The and military superpower since the end

The institution that the research hopes to highlight is the military. Special focus will be laid on the expansion that has taken place in the military since the end of World War 2.

The expansion that has been taking place in the military is not justified.

There are economic and social implications to this expansion. The United States of America has always been an economic and military superpower since the end of World War II. It is a known fact that the Soviet Union and the United States both expanded militarily in order to deter each other from war.

It was absolutely reasonable and necessary to maintain a large military spending under such conditions. Despite the fact that the Cold War had already ended, and the United States continues to top the list of top spenders on defense throughout the world. Though it is in debt and has large deficits every year, the U. S. is spending more money on defense even. This is the basis of the questions that arise throughout the course of the research.

Since the Cold War had ended, should the United States cut defense spending? How much is the United States spending on defense compared to other countries? What are some reasons to support cutting defense pending? What are some reasons to oppose cutting defense spending? Borch, Casey, and Michael Wallace.
