Convention on Cybercrime:

The Convention on Cybercrime is an international treaty to encounter all the cybercrimes associated with computer and internet. It was strategized by Council of Europe on 23rd November 2001 which came into enforcement on 1st July 2004. This convention is also known as the Budapest Convention. Canada, Japan, and China also participated in the Convention.

Objectives of the Convention:

The Convention of Cybercrimes gave a platform to all the nations across the world to adopt various techniques and strategies to investigate and take serious measures against any group or an individual that poses a cyber threat to any other group or an individual. The convention provoked the participating nations to adopt a uniform and common criminal policy in order to protect the society from any cybercrime or activities that may harm the reputation of an individual or a group. The Convention highlighted various emerging threats associated with the usage of computer and the internet which include copyright infringements, identity theft, financial frauds, child pornography, unlawful access to sensitive data and information, virus attacks on sensitive computers and database and misuse of devices.

The main objectives of the Convention were:

To adopt a uniform policy against cybercrimes and to harmonize greater international co-operation to encounter all such criminal activities associated with the use of computer and internet.

Strategizing laws at domestic levels to encounter such threats

Strategizing procedural laws to encounter any issues

Personal Analysis of the Convention of Cybercrimes:

This is a good step taken by the Council of Europe which ensures the protection of individuals and the groups against all the ill-legal activities associated with cybercrimes. The treaty stresses all the countries to play an effective role in this regard. This step will enhance greater international harmony among the nations and they will work together against all such groups who pose threats to an individual or to a group when working online. The nations were in dire need to establish a uniform code of conduct and a uniform legal policy to encounter such issues. However, the treaty needs to elaborate more widely the actions to be taken against any culprit found associated with such criminal activities and how the nations will deal with such threats on a broader scale.
