Other children will go with me,

and march the streets of Birmingham to make our country free (Randall 384)."

Ballad of Birmingham is a classic story of a boy whose mother was concerned about his safety while he was in pursuit of civil rights. He asked permission from his mother to go downtown instead of playing out in the streets. The mother refused yet again since she was aware of the danger that was outside. She tried to scare him off by talking about dogs, clubs, guns and jail. Although the boy reassures his mother, in the poem, that he would not be alone and others would join him in the freedom fight, the mother did not consent because of her fear of the guns and told her son to go sing in the church instead. The boy's mother seemed to be ready to go to the church herself since she was a spick and span with white shoes and white gloves. One of the messages of the poem is that danger might still be in your pursuit no matter how much careful you try to be. In this poem, the mother was left with just one shoe his baby boy and no matter how hard she tried she could not find her son.
