Politics

The political climate in the United States today is heated. Two major political parties, the Democrats and the Republicans, are constantly fighting for power and blaming the other party for all of America's problems. This is not a new phenomenon in American politics, but what is new is the fact that for all of their claimed differences, the Democrat and Republican parties are very similar. Many facts point to the reality that the Democrat and Republican parties are similar in more ways than they are different.

One way that the Republican and Democrat parties are similar is they both are reliant on financial support from wealthy individuals and corporations.

Recent Supreme Court rulings have allowed unlimited, undisclosed donations to be made by the super-rich and by multinational corporations to politicians from both parties that are seeking election. This creates a situation where both parties must do the bidding of these powerful donors once they are elected. If they do not, then these donors will support someone else in the next election. Both of these parties are dependant on rich people and special interest money to support their candidates.

Another way Democrats and Republicans are similar is they refuse to take any responsibility for anything bad that happens. Both parties blame the other incessantly for the problems in America. Republicans blame the current state of the economy on the Democrats even though a Republican Congress and President sowed the seeds of the financial meltdown.

Democrats ignore worthwhile gains Republicans make in everything from social policy to international relations. They ignore the amount of funding Republican administrations have sent to help AIDS victims in Africa while focusing on any comment or policy by a Republican that might be a bit offensive to dim-witted. Both of these parties are similar in the way that they react negatively to the other party.

It is true that these two parties do differ in their basic ideology. The Republicans claim that they want to reduce the role of government in the lives of American citizens. They claim that government is too big and that we need to cut expenditure. They believe in low taxes and self-reliance. The Democrats say that they believe government can make a positive difference for people, especially the poor. They believe in funding social programs that help people get good educations and good jobs. They say they look out for the poor and needy while the Republicans only look after their rich friends. Democrats believe that government should have an elevated role in the life of the average citizen.

While ideology may differ between these two parties, their actions are amazingly similar. Members of both parties fight to preserve federal funding for programs they believe in. They all want the Federal government to pay for everything from agricultural subsidies to food stamps. No one in either party is willing to do things that will be unpopular with the voters back home. As a result, members of both parties keep the federal money flowing to their own districts while criticizing others for doing the same.

Republicans and Democrats claim to be different. The fact is that in today's government, they are much more similar than they are different. They all take money from the rich so they can get elected, they are equally nasty to one another and they all vote to benefit their own districts while criticizing others for doing the same.
