Set a lexical field

Find this theme in question will allow you later to define a lexical field. That is all rhetoric terms related to it, as the words “ forest”, “ tree”, and “ flowers” if you write a poem about nature. You can already start by grouping the words with which you plan to do the rhyme. The fact of listing these many words will help you deal pretty verses and richness of your vocabulary will guide readers to understand what you have tried to illustrate through your poem.

Attractive stanzas

The stanza determines the length of the poem together to group together and the size of the stanza is mainly if the poem forms a homogeneous group of stanzas to the regular (same number of feet) or the choice to alternate the lengths stanza is assumed. The best-known being the sonnet consists of two quatrains (stanzas of four lines) and two triplets (three lines).

Write beautiful verse

The verse sets the pace in the stanza and is measured in number of syllables when it comes to regular. We say it is monosyllabic up to 12 syllables, better known under the term of Alexandria. If this is your first poem, perhaps prefer free verse, rhyming or not, as your inspiration. Then re-read your poem aloud to judge its musicality.

Select prose

Prose is the free form par excellence, devoid of rhyme; it neither has feet nor gives importance to the length and number of stanzas. That said, you will still be creative for your stylistic and melody of your rhythm because these elements alone will judge your poetic art.

Let your emotions

To write a beautiful poem, let your heart speak! The poem is like a song that tells a story with sincerity and many emotions. Most interesting to reflect the poet's soul and it is for you to find the balance to sail your feelings and your writer's soul. Remember, poetry is a chance to live simple words into real poetry.
