This is not much of an issue today, at least in the US, as regulations prevent the hunting of endangered animals. However, in the not-so-distant past, some species were hunted to near extinction, like the American Buffalo. The cougar was also locally exterminated in most areas of the country to protect livestock. However, the elimination of such an apex predator led to explosions in the deer population.

Although some predators have been eliminated, today that role is being filled by man who enjoys hunting deer for sport. Therefore, the hunting is necessary to restore nature's balance. Although rare, inevitably there are going to be hunting accidents. Most of these are caused when hunters mistake other hunters for prey. It is important to exercise safe hunting practices and wear proper clothing to identify yourself to other hunters to avoid injury or death. When done right and for the right reasons, hunting can be a safe, fun and valuable activity.
