He dedicated almost his life to the Revolution of the United States. Besides being a talented inventor with many significant inventions that have changed the world until now, he was a successful politician as well. He was considered the elder statesman by the time of the Revolution and the Constitutional Convention.

His contributions to the Revolution of the United States are priceless. He deserves the respect from everybody in America for everything that he did to help America overcome a lot of difficulties in its very first years. His early political career, and his role of the Revolutionary are very worth to be noticed as the most fascinating, interesting in Benjamin Franklins life. The political path of Benjamin Franklin was very confused and complicated He is considered the most American and the least American of the revolution leaders. There were a lot of interesting things that led to his political career.

Franklin was born into a large poor family of ten children, he was not expected to be the leading man he was. Through the printing press Franklin was able to support himself for the rest of his life. His father was a soap maker, and his family thought Franklin would be a part of the clergy.

Franklins expectations make his successes so much more impacting because of his ability to be a leader from a young age and represent America as a powerful nation. He became a wealthy man, who was the owner of many printing firms on Pennsylvania.

Only at the age of forty two, Franklin decided to retire from his active business because he believed he no longer would have to work for a living. Franklin's retirement was a major event for him. He became a gentleman and did what other gentlemen did. He started to do more reading, studying, making experiments which made him become famous world-wide. Then he brought into government and became a member of the Philadelphia City Council in 1748. Franklin didn't stop there. He wanted more than that and he was on his way to England to persuade to make Pennsylvania a royal province.

Suddenly, with his involvement in the Stamp Act that got him into a misunderstanding from people in America. That Stamp Act was a caution for Franklin to be more careful about being royalist. Everything turned out to be very bad. In addition, his involvement in Thomas Hutchinson letters was also a factor that frustrated and disappointed Franklin. He got blamed for everything that created the political crisis of both the United States and England. All of his expectations that he had in the imperial were over. That turn Franklin into a patriot that no one could ever have imagined.

In 1766, Franklin testified in the British Parliament against the Stamp Act of 1765, which required that all legal documents, newspapers, books, playing cards and other printed materials in the American colonies carry a tax stamp. Although the Stamp Act was repealed in 1766, additional regulatory measures followed, leading to ever-increasing anti-British sentiment and eventual armed uprising by the American colonists. His only goal since then was just to clear himself up and prove to America that he was a real patriot.

In March 1775, he sailed for America and became a passionate patriot, more patriot than most. He became the representative American when he was sent to Paris. France saw Franklin as an international hero and of course a symbolic American. His mission to persuade France to be the American's ally seemed impossible from the start. France was unwilling to try to get in to the war with Britain. However, with his ability, he finally brought France into the war and moreover, during the war, he was successful to get many loans from the poor French government.

No other American could have done what he did which was getting aid during the American Revolution and he was considered the greatest diplomat America has ever had. He knew how to get the adoration from all of the people in France. Since Franklin came to France, his face appeared everywhere, on medallions, on snuffboxes, on candy boxes, in rings, in statues, in prints, women even did their hair like Franklin's. Because of that adoration, Franklin never expected that the King of France, Louis XVI became so jealous of him and dragged into court for no reason.

His appearance during he was in France also got all the adoration from people in France, even French leaders. In the court days, he dressed in a simple brown and white linen suit and wore a fur cap, no wig, and no sword. It turned out the court and the French nobility loved it. The French were also impressed by his republican which was very amusing because of Franklin's speaking was no bad, he just remained quiet almost the time in court. Even though Franklin was on a very important mission for America, he seemed to enjoy the eight years in France which might be his happiest years of his life.

Franklin was also a big part of the process of negotiating the Treaty of Paris that ended the war of America and England. After the Peace Treaty was signed, Franklin turned back to America in 1785. Franklin died five years later, at age 84, on April 17, 1790, in Philadelphia. “ He had not led the revolution movement like John Adams. He had not written a great revolution document like Jefferson. He had not led armies like Washington. ” (Wood, 88) However, He still was known as an international hero, along with Washington the most celebrated American in the world. He was seen as a patriot and scientist by Americans.
