

Mans qualities and their role in life

Philosophy

Hobbes believed that there would never be a society living with harmony so long as there is continual fear, risk of violent death, the light of man, friendlessness, poverty, and nasty and brutal hospitality. Locke represented a developing trend in the European community during the 1600s and 1700s to deploy cause for the last opinions of all humankind, including the conduct of governments. The shared assumption of governance stated that a common society is a submission of power by the state to support agreements and so forth (Gayley 47). Pope, the writer, relates himself with the society, as well as delight. Pope claims that the world was made for man’s happiness and desires. Therefore, everybody is linked o the chain of worldwide order (Gayley 51). The second letter in the essay states that man is positioned between god and animals. Life is described as the short interval between birth and death, hence connected to man’s existence. In eth essay, Pope goes through a disorder of thinking and passion, making him become puzzled. Ultimately, Pope claims that the best way for man to understand his qualities and place in life is properly studying himself.
