

The open door policy

The “ Open Door Policy” is a foreign personal businesss thought which refers to the policy in 1899 that was made so that all states could utilize China to merchandise without taking control of China. The “ Open Door Policy” with China was proposed in the unfastened door notes of September-November 1899. by William Woodville Rockhill. The United States gained power of the Philippine Islands in 1898 and became an Eastern Power.

When the Imperial Powers were shutting down on taking over China the US felt threatened because they would be losing out on a big sum of trade that made up most of their economic system. United States Secretary of State John Hay sent notes to the major powers France. Germany. Britain. Italy. Japan. and Russia inquiring them to state that they would non interfere with the trading traveling on in China. The notes stated that all European states and the United States were allowed to merchandise within China without limitation by other states.

Each state tried to disregard the petition stating that they could non perpetrate until all of the other states had complied. but in July 1900 Hay announced that each state had granted consent. The lone states that voiced concern were Russia and Japan. The Open Door Notes was an of import papers. and it greatly benefitted China. Even though John Hay’s Open Door Notes were written to assist America. they ended up greatly bettering the development of China. every bit good as leting the United States equal trade rights.
