If you are a student of college or university and have a task to create a paper about you, you may have a question “ how to do an assignment about myself?”. To get the answer, you need to get familiar with the main standards and requirements. You have to follow a couple of guidelines. Also, it is very useful to read about how to do an assignment in 3rd person.

All these will allow you to focus on the process and prepare a perfect essay. As a rule, the process of creation of essay about myself occupies three stages.

Each academic paper has its formatting and structural specific features. To deliver a logically built and coherent paper, one has to follow all the formatting and structuring rules. It will allow making a paper maximally sense-loaded and presenting one’s thoughts in logical order.

Each author knows that any paper starts with the intro. An introduction is the first portion of information, which a target reader receives. A writer should make it maximally effective and appealing. It should comprise a background sentence as well as a thesis. The thesis is the last statement of the intro, and its function is to illustrate the position of the author.

The core part of the paper is the main body. It should include two – three persuasive arguments, which will support a thesis. One can include real-life examples or add examples from the literature. The main task of a student working on this essay is to find relevant arguments that will clarify his position and illustrate his point of view clearly.

The last structural element is a conclusion. The conclusion is a summary of all info presented in the text. The task of the author is to generalize the key statements and clarify one's position expressed in the thesis. The purpose of this part of writing is to allow the target reader to conclude all the available info. A significant nuance is that you need to refer to a thesis, in conclusion, to let the target audience see the logical connection between structural parts of a text.
