Racial profiling is the act of suspecting or the targeting of a person using the basis of the race of such a person to further the idea of stereotyping about the race of such a person without focusing on the individual suspicion of such a person.

It is prudent that racial profiling by the police has been fueled by racial segregation and the same has had a negative impact on the police force because of the reduction of public confidence on the police which has then affected the operation and the activities of the police in the modern society. In this manner, there is a need to examine the same and identify how it affects the daily lives of the population, people under the greatest threat of the same, and suggest solutions that can bring a long-term solution and improve living conditions of the population. It is prudent that the issue of racial profiling is widespread in Canada and Toronto has been the center of the vice thereby establishing the need to examine the same with the view of creating a long-term solution.

Despite governments rolling out various inquiries to examine the same, a lot less has been done because there is no action taken against the police with the view of ending the vice (Hayle, Wortley, & Tanner, 2016). The blacks decry discrimination against them and the poor police in the city, a matter which has made life difficult for them in Canada. According to Ontario Human Rights Commission (OHRC), 'public interest inquiry' into the racial profiling by the Toronto police only proves what the blacks in the city know but offers not the solution to challenges that the blacks face. The conduct of Toronto Police Service (TPS) has been under scrutiny for a long time (Zack, 2015). Racial profiling police in Canada is a critical issue, and the authorities need to find a long-term solution to the same because it affects the daily lives of blacks, limits their engagement in economic development and threatens unity between the blacks and whites in Canada.

To help in addressing the issue of police racial profiling in Canada, there are questions that help to address the issue and create a solution to the same, and some of them include: 1. Why has the issue of police racial profiling lasted for so long in Canada? 2. What is the role of the police in ending racial profiling? 3. How does political leadership influence the issue of police racial profiling? 4. What is the evidence of racial discrimination by the police? 5. Who are the people under the greatest threat? Seeking solutions to the above questions would help to get a holistic overview of the police racial discrimination in Canada and suggest solutions to the problem and improve quality of lives for the black community (Bell, Hopson, Craig, & Robinson, 2014). First, in soliciting answers to the reasons why police racial discrimination has lasted for long in the country, one issue that comes out is that the police force is not determined to end police racial discrimination in the country and research reveals that the police only get to do the right thing when they receive pressure from politicians. However, it is on very rare occasions that politicians force them to act to end racial discrimination (Lewis, 2015).

Lack of willingness of politicians in the city and the province is the reason behind the widespread cases of discrimination and why it has remained a problem ravaging the society for a long time. According to the Ontario Human Rights Commission, the issue of police racial discrimination in Canada has affected generations and those who faced the form of discrimination in <https://assignbuster.com/racial-with-the-view-of-creating-a/> their youth still warn their grandchildren about the vice in the society. The long-term vice in country suggest a never-ending problem thereby suggesting a dark future for the blacks in Canada; this is because the problem has been allowed to continue for decades without a solution being sought (Peirone, Maticka-Tyndale, Gbadebo, & Kerr, 2017). The other reason why police racial discrimination has overstayed in Canada is that there is lack of diversity in the police force and a majority of the police are whites thereby making it challenging to develop initiatives to tackle the menace in the society. Finally, there are no or weak policies on police racial discrimination that can help in eliminating police racial discrimination in the country thereby making it challenging to prosecute perpetrators of the same (Mosher, & Akins, 2015). The police can play a great role in ending the vice in the society, and this calls for their active engagement in community welfare and works with different organizations to end the vice. In this manner, there is a need for the police, TPS, to become actively engaged with various stakeholders among them being the non-governmental organizations and take actions on the reports and inquiries (Marshall, 2017).

Police should crack a whip on the police officers that show explicit bias in the delivery of police services and offer uniform services to the population. Additionally, the police can improve the relationship with the community and collaborate with them to end the cases of police profiling against the black community (Seigel, 2017). By improving the relationship with the community, the police will have an easy time identifying the challenges facing the community and the community will suggest ways of ending the vice to the police. Furthermore, the police force should be actively involved with the police and provide necessary report and data to highlight areas that face the biggest threat of police profiling. Besides, the police force should devolve more funds and resources to fighting of police racial profiling by providing office space for recording the forms of racial profiling which help to acquire raw data on the same (Khenti, 2014).

Additionally, having a watchdog can help to monitor the conduct of the police and prosecute officers that profile the black community with the view of discouraging others to desist from the same. Finally, the Toronto police should provide documents under legal obligations to the Ontario human rights code (Kitossa, 2014). With regards to the political leadership in the country, it is prudent that politicians can play a great role to end police racial profiling. One of the duties of politicians is to enact stringent laws and tough punitive measures against the police officers who further racial profiling (Bell, Hopson, Craig, & Robinson, 2014).

The tough punitive measures would help to discourage police racial profiling and create a long-term solution to the vice. Additionally, the political class can also rally the people to strengthen civil rights movement and advocate for equal rights for all races and prevent cases of discrimination in the country. Furthermore, politicians can use their authority in the political class to force the police to make the necessary changes and stop the cases of discrimination in the society (Zack, 2015). The political power can play a great role in Canada and such authority can help in ending the vice in the society and improve lives of the population.

Moreover, the conduct of the political class during and after campaigns also play a role in ending police racial profiling in Canada. In this manner, the police should be role models to the communities and act in accordance sensitize the population on the importance of a unified society to as to boost unity and end racial segregation. Politicians should not base their political affiliations on the races, but such should be policy-based, the result of the same is a better society (Lewis, 2015). Finally, there is a need for politicians to encourage uniform development in the society without any form of favoritism in the provision of services to the population and boost diversity in the population.

The evidence of police racial profiling in Canada is the discriminative stopping and questioning of drivers where the police tend to stop black drivers while allowing the white drivers to pass the road check without questioning (Hayle, Wortley, & Tanner, 2016). The other evidence of profiling is the use of force against the blacks when the police carry out routine checks; the same force is not applied on the whites in the same cases. The other evidence of police racial profiling is a high number of arrests and charges among the black races; this is in addition to the forms and conditions of release for various offense categories among them being possession of drugs obstruction of justice or police assault (Marshall, 2017). Furthermore, the police usually apply selective justice for minor offenses such as causing disturbance and failure to comply with bail condition. The people that usually fall victims of police racial profiling are black women and the blacks that are mentally challenged, and this is evident in the disproportionate use of brutal force among such groups of people.

In this manner, the effect of such cases of discrimination is widespread thereby leading to the need to create a long-term solution by working with both government agencies and the population (Kitossa, 2014). Learning about police racial profiling in Canada helps to identify the effects of the same which informs strategies required to end the vice and create a society that encourages growth and development for all. There is a need for additional research to identify solutions that can be used to end the vice and create a society where everyone can live and grow (Seigel, 2017). Finally, there should be an overhaul of the police force in Canada to weed out the officers that encourage racial discrimination and encourage diversity in the police force. Conclusion Examining the cases of police racial profiling in Canada helps to highlight the cases of racial profiling and the challenges that the victims go through in their daily lives.

It is prudent to acknowledge that a lot is needed to create a long-term solution and everyone needs to participate in changing the social fabric of the society to boost inclusivity and unity in the society. Additionally, the civil right movements should improve their activities and participation in the society and advocate for equal rights in the society and eliminate any cases of discrimination. The same suggestion is directed towards the government of Canada which is seen to be dismissing the cry of the black population for decades thereby allowing perpetuation of the vice. In this case, the government of Canada should set stringent policies to help curb police racial profiling and take punitive measures against police officers that encourage racial discrimination.
