Generation Y in the Workplaces Emily Thatcher in the article how those millennials will make the workplace better for every one recons on the changes expected in the corporate society in the near future. In fact, she demonstrates that the change is already with us by the behaviour of the Generation Y. Parents to this generation have raised their children as their friends and peers, which gives them the confidence to ask for whatever they require. In the workplace, they believe in having the best as everyone else even if they have more experience. In addition, they believe that their opinions and ideas count as everyone else. I believe that the corporate society will have to change to accommodate generation y since they need new and young blood to operate optimally.

I agree with Thatcher that the future of American workforce is brighter. The days of richest Americans getting richer for doing less with the middle class doing all the work and getting less earnings for it are ending. A new generation have learnt to take their extracurricular skills seriously such that they can create jobs for themselves. In addition, many will not do a job they hate just to be employed. They would rather stay in their parent's houses doing nothing because their parents can provide for them. To them, the world provides enormous opportunities and they have to choose the best. In the 21st century, advancement in technology has empowered many and they would want the companies they work for adopt these technology. In conclusion, generation y understands the easier options of carrying out business and will not bow to old complex methods. Companies will have to adopt easier options to accommodate them, making it easier for the existing workforce.
