Like departments and professions, the workplaces of the psychologists also vary according to their proficiency. The most common places for psychologists include schools, colleges, universities, hospitals, health centers, clinics, and police stations. The degree of psychology offers the graduates and most graduates very lucrative, handsome and attractive remunerations and salaries, which is more than sufficient to lead a very respectable life in society. Psychologists are properly educated and trained in their respective fields in order to obtain the proper benefit of their skill and knowledge. The writer cites the Labour Department of the USA, according to which the psychologists climb the career growth ladder much faster than other professionals because they are given significant motivation and salary revision so that they can work more diligently while paying their services to the individuals and institutions. Though the status of the psychology undergraduates is far lower than that of postgraduates and doctorates, yet the undergraduates can also find their career in some comparatively trivial departments. On the contrary, the individuals having a psychology degree at the graduate level or above can seek a wide variety and divergent range of career opportunities.
