

Why i want to be a pharmacist

Society

I have always wanted to work in healthcare for as long as I can remember. Ever since I was a young child, it gave me such great joy to assist someone who needed my help and I have continued to feel the same way to date.

Before considering this path, I worked as a nursing assistant. This line of work gave me immense satisfaction because I could care for people. However, I grew fond of my patients and it became so devastating when some of them passed away. At this point, I realized that my compassionate personality could not cope with such close contact with patients. I needed a line of work that allowed me to care for the sick but at the same time, maintain some distance from them. My answer could only be found in pharmacy.

I have done a lot of volunteer work in this line and although I have not been paid for my efforts, my experience in this line of work has prepared me to deal with the intricacies of the profession. Through pharmacy, I can get a chance to do some community work especially with regard to immunization processes and other procedures that involve offering service to the community.

I also believe that pharmacy is a rewarding career. It is one of the most trusted professions in the country. In fact, research shows that pharmacists are the second most trusted professionals in health care. Through pharmacy, I will be exposed to other equally important health care providers.

This means that I can then cooperate with these professionals to improve the overall health of my community. For instance, pharmacy would allow me to offer advice to doctors who may want to find out information about a certain disease.

On top of that, I will also be working hand in hand with other sections of the health care profession such as radiography, bio-lab technology among others. These interactions will build my character as a true professional and I will always get an opportunity to learn and grow.

A career in pharmacy is highly flexible. In contrast to other professions such as neurosurgery, in pharmacy, I will always be in control of my working experience hence leaving time for a social life. This degree of flexibility can also allow me to pursue further studies or other work related projects during my free time.

Pharmacy is one of the most demanding professions in the health sector. This is especially because it is a combination of various disciplines. For instance, knowledge in industrial chemistry is essential to understand the chemical compositions of drugs. Also, I will need some knowledge in biochemistry to understand how the body works.

The human anatomy and physiology will also be essential. Internalizing all these disciplines requires a great degree of dedication, hard work and enthusiasm which I have in abundance. My interests and talents are definitely compatible with this profession. These are the reasons why I feel pharmacy is the career for me.

Conclusion

Any profession ought to be in line with one's personality. I believe that my interests, experiences, talents and personality provide me with a unique advantage in this line of work. On top of that, pharmacy is rewarding, rich and challenging at the same time.
