

Why are you a strong candidate for the Johns Hopkins Carey Business School program...

Education, University

The Carey Business School at Johns Hopkins University offers a challenging program enriched by the diverse experiences of its students. The mission of the school to “teach business with humanity in mind,” as well as the multitude of program offerings based on a global approach to modern business, insure that the school is set apart from other business programs.

The interdepartmental academics are second to none, and well-rounded graduates are the result of the academically rigorous programs.

The global perspective of the business school is well known, and my international experience makes me a good candidate for admission. My Bachelor's of Business Administration was awarded by Hong Kong Baptist University. University was challenging, but through hard work I was able to be academically successful. During my studies I held several jobs within large multinational corporations in their China operations. Furthermore, I was the leader of the champion team in a national competition sponsored by Unilever, where we developed and ran a project for four months. These positions have reinforced in me the value of teamwork and the necessity to step up and be a leader if I notice a part of a project wavering. I have constantly been called upon to come up with novel solutions to diverse problems while staying within the bounds of accepted norms of behavior. Despite my focus in business, I have many interests beyond business administration. Philosophy is one of my passions, and I have immersed myself deeply in the study of western philosophy and thought. I have experience relating to diverse peoples from a variety of countries and I am able to explain elaborate and difficult concepts to laypeople. In sum, I welcome the challenge posed by the Carey Business School and hope my collaborative schools will prove invaluable in my future studies.
