Karl Marx and Frederick Engels in their book The Communist Manifesto argue that all societies through the entirety of history have gone through class struggle. The first section of the pamphlet discusses the development of societies through class struggle.

Which means the conflict that occurs between the working and ruling class. Up to this point the blueprint of societies has always had an oppressive ruling class controlling the majority. The bourgeois or ruling class has oppressed and exploited the proletarians or working class through the private ownership of land. The bourgeoisie use the proletarians for labor while taking in majority of the profits and capital. Capital is the profits or private property of the bourgeois that is their wealth. This system will eventually cause class struggle and eventually end in revolution.

At this time communism should be put into place. The second section discusses the relationship between communists and proletarians and what communism will ultimately succeed at doing. Communism wants to get rid of the bourgeois property because this is what enslaves the proletarians. By doing this, it will put the means of production, which are the instruments and methods of producing goods in the hands of the proletarians. Several steps are offered to the working class so they can eventually gain complete power once all ownership of property is eliminated. Once power is gained they should terminate all class distinctions. The third section discusses the distinctions of communism from the rest of the social systems during this time. Communism ultimately rejects all of these systems because they will inevitably lead to conflict between classes.

The concluding section discusses the communist's opinion on conflicts in European countries and that these countries are nearing a bourgeois revolution. The document concludes by proclaiming a communist revolution and the final words are " Working men of all countries, unite!"
