The purpose of this research will be compare and contrast the various laws that regulate the usage of marijuana for medical purposes in three American states namely Alaska, California and New Mexico

Background

Several researchers contend that marijuana is perhaps one of the most commonly abused drugs. Reportedly, more than 60 million Americans use the drug occasionally or regularly. Even though this is as drug whose parts have been valued at one time or another, the marijuana legalization debate still graces the list of the some of the most heated debated of all time.

Marijuana is banned in most countries but recent developments, particularly in light of the usage of the drug for medicinal purposes, have seen the drug being legalized in most countries, and more conspicuously, some states in America, though with stringent laws governing its usage.

Method

Basically, the research will be based on secondary sources with a few primary sources that might be available on the topic. The research will involve sourcing for information on the medicinal laws governing the usage of marijuana in the three states and reviewing the information for similarity and differences. Additionally, the research will try to explore that various circumstances that led to the legalization of marijuana for medical purposes in these states. To make the research more panoptic and interesting, there will be need to include information about various court cases (if any) revolving around the usage of cannabis (natural or artificial) and the role that court rulings in such court cases played in the legalization of marijuana in the three states.
