He's inspired by a brief encounter with a little person to invite unusual-looking folks – including a bearded woman, a local overweight man, and a dwarf and starts show. The circus becomes large by Barnum's show is critically panned, and the masses love it. As a consequence, he has afforded the money to moves his family to a mansion and even enrolls his daughter Caroline in a school that specialized in ballet. He has realistic his promise to Charity. Although he has earned a fortune, but Barnum can't stop looking for approval from the upper crust by co-operating with a high-society business entrepreneur, the playwright Phillip Carlyle because his father was treated like dirt, he was treated like dirt so he doesn't want his children to be treated the same and, moreover, because parts of the callously mocked by his critics (including a snooty theatre reviewer, played by Paul Sparks) called Barnum's team is a freak show, a wide collection of oddities.

To appeal to a high-brow audience, he goes on a tour with the opera singer, Jenny Lind, and has a scandal with her but he remains faithful to Charity, his wife. After the tour, Jenny kisses him like a goodbye kiss on the stage then quits the circus. Barnum comes back home and found that his wife is leaving with her bags packed as debtors whom he owes had threatened to foreclose on his house. She is heartbroken from the picture she had seen on the newspaper of him and Jenny kissing. He tries to explain himself, but it didn't work out, Consequently, Barnum goes to a bar to drink, and his team follows him there to comfort him. He picks himself up, and they decide to do a show which they dub ' from now on' then he thereafter goes to the town of birth

Fourth Paragraph: A Key Moment or Idea

One of the highlights about the movie is when Barnum's wife abandons him, the bank has foreclosed on his house because of the loan he once took and he seems to have lost everything in his life and he goes for a drink. His team finds him there and comforts him. They tell him that while the society perceived them as freaks because of their abnormal appearances, he has seen them for what they could be and gave them a job, a purpose in life, therefore, that they should thank him for everything that they had become. This part is the inspirational highlight of this movie as the message conveyed is that we ought to perceive people not by their appearance but by what they could become.

Fifth Paragraph: Evaluate the Movie

In conclusion, this particular movie is inspirational to today's generation and to any person who has a startup and is aiming to grow it in the future. It communicates that even though there would be hurdles and challenges one ought not to give up but to use that which they have to get that which they do not have. I particularly like this movie for its universality. This is to mean that kids can watch it for entertainment because of the great musicals and adults as watch it as an inspiration and entertainment as well as a learning experience of not giving up.
