

Why somewhere else
– i may think

Why do I am here? Do I serve a greater purpose beyond the satisfaction I, get from my daily activities - however mundane or heroic they may be? Is the meaning of life internal to life, to be found inherently in life's many activities, or is it external, to be found in a realm somehow outside of life, but to which life leads? In the internal view it's the satisfaction and happiness I, gain from my actions that justify life. This does not necessarily imply a selfish code of conduct.

The external interpretation commonly makes the claim that there is a realm to which life leads after death. My life on earth is evaluated by a supernatural being some call God, who will assign to me some reward or punishment after death. The meaning of our life, its purpose and justification, is to fulfil the expectations of God, and then to receive my final reward. But within the internal view of meaning, I, can argue that meaning is best found in activities that benefit others, the community, or the Earth as a whole.

An interesting way to contrast the internal and external views is to imagine walking through a beautiful landscape. My purpose in walking may be just to get somewhere else - I may think there's a better place off in the distance. In this case the meaning of my journey through the landscape is external to the experience of the landscape itself. On the other hand, I might be intensely interested in what the landscape holds. It may be a forest, or it may contain farms, villages. I may stop along the way, study, learn, converse, with little thought about why you are doing these things other than the pleasure they give to me.

I might stop to help someone who is sick: in fact, I might stay many years, and found a hospital. What then is the meaning of my journey? Is it satisfying or worthwhile only if I have satisfied an external purpose – only if it gets myself somewhere else? Why, indeed, cannot the satisfactions and pleasures of the landscape, and of your deeds, be enough? Simple Ways which made my Life Meaningful: Ø Following my aspirations. Sometimes I, confuse aspirations with personal goals, but they are completely different. Ø Being passionate Ø Living by standard code of ethics.
