what and who is intelligence? is it the perfect student? the student who gets straight A's, the student in the front row by choice, not because they made a bad decision, is it the perfect attendance student? or is it the student on the very back row in the class, the one who has his ipod listening to heavy metal music, headbanging along to the addictive beat? who knows?, it's neither, being intelligent isn't just being the perfect student, or the worst student, but in my opinion I can almost bet that the "bad" student is most likely the more intelligent one. to me intelligence doesn't depend on where you're from, how well you do in school, and how much money you have! intelligence is so much more, it's about what you've been through, how you deal with situations, how you think, how you take in information and deal with problems.

it's about looking and reading the fine details that the big picture doesn't show. it's the reading between the lines. so my guess is that the bad or not perfect student is more likely to be more intelligent just because they have been in situations where you have to do something to learn it. intelligence isn't learning from a book, or the internet or listening to some teacher lecture you all day. it's about getting out in life and being in problems and situations where you have to learn to deal with things, that's what makes you intelligent. not if you make the best grades in school, and not if you speak up the most.

take Albert Einstein for example, he is probably one of the greatest most intelligent men in history, but he didn't get there by being a stuck-up perfect rich student, in fact Albert was considered mentally impaired, he didn't learn what he knew from a book, he learned it from trial and error, from getting out there, doing something, and making a difference. making a difference? your probably asking yourself, yes making a difference. you can be smart and intelligent without putting it to great use, a honest intelligent person shares what they know, and tries to make a difference for the world. even though i may realize this, not everyone does and not everyone is going to agree with me, but i can almost guarantee if you go ask a teacher or a proffesor which student is more intelligent, their going to say the perfect student, unless that teacher is different. comment and tell me what you think.

and whether or not you disagree
