Women's were still affected from the dangers of sex behavior and the author said is because many studies on this matter are needed. However Beam's new sex education plan will eliminate all that and will concentrate on comprehensive sex education. The author has no information of how the program will be funded but she hopes for the better. I agree with president Obama about his plan due to different factors. First because abstinence involves personal decision to refrain from sex and at the same time abstinence can not stop rape or save teenagers in most cases.

According to Sharon Jason, in her new article<sup>14</sup> "Obama budget cuts funds for abstinence-only sex education", Beam's sex education plan will work fine because a big budget of $178 million for every teen pregnancy is proposed; furthermore a study which was done about the previous program she says refutes arguments that abstinence education doesn't affect sexual behavior. Jason describes Beam's plan as open to innovation, and it could include abstinence-only if strong signs show its effectiveness in the first place.

Obama asks everybody to be optimistic about his plan and trust education. The fact is the previous sex education programs tell the truth about sex, and it is the most important aspect for human survival, and that there's nothing wrong with a healthy sex life, it makes adults feel as if they're doing something wrong. Besides it doesn't change the fact that the best option is abstinence until marriage, yet many religions agree that Beam's plan will stop many innocent lives from coming to the world: perhaps it will cause the U. S. Total fertility rate to fall slightly, to 2.0 children per woman. This means that the country is again at "below replacement" fertility, or doesn't have enough children being born for the population to naturally replace itself

(Cheryl, 2009). In reality Beam's plan won't change the truth, researchers are showing that most girls don't like their life to change because their pregnancy; in fact they wished they had waited and told the guy to get lost because that few minutes of fun just wasn't worth the price they have had to pay.

Therefore teaching sex in schools may have negative effects on children as they learn more and more about this matter. This declaration was made by Pope John Paul II of the Vatican in 1986. For this reason it is preferable to let our children learn to be confident of themselves and stay away from bad sex actions. In Dalton there is never a good manner for teaching sex because sex itself is a practice and not an academic learning. Abstinence programs have had negative effects on how to protect teenagers, mainly NAS Eden a major crystals at ten sustenance approach.

Teenagers can not protect themselves from epidemics as HIV, sexually transmitted diseases and pregnancy (Rob, 2010). Yet Abstinence often does not teach people about contraception safer sex and many young people remain unaware of how to protect themselves from becoming infected with sexually transmitted diseases. President Obama's sex education plan may work and should be successful, except in some instances it can have negative effects that reflect on the future of our generations.
