Parenting What major concepts describe how families function as a social system? i. Families avail physical environment for its members to develop. This is especially in terms of physical growth and behavioral development whereby the latter aspect prompts them to fit effectively in the larger society.

ii. Families avail economic or monetary support to the members essential for accomplishing their life targets. Since, by themselves cannot adequately manage to attain them, for instance, pursuing their respective careers.

iii. They also help in socializing the members and preparing them to cope with varied life's unpredictable predicaments. This is by instilling essential values and beliefs whose core purpose is to ensure that they live harmoniously with others.

What affect can communication have in the family system?

Undeniably, the existence of a healthy communication in a family setting prompts its members to create enmeshed relationship, hence maintain the required cohesion (Hepworth 255). Therefore, they end up depending on each other whereby they are capable of finding solutions meant to confront certain life's predicaments, which are difficult when, tackled singlehandedly (Hepworth 255). Communication in the family system also develops a sense of belonging among its members. This is due to the closeness characterizing diverse members' interactions and attention they normally enjoy (Hepworth 255). Mainly, this is in the form of both material and emotional assistance.

Therefore, this equips them with the necessary skills meant to fit in the larger society and contribute as necessitated, for instance, the children.

Additionally, communication helps to strengthen family bonds whereby individual members through their actions and talking where they constantly assure each other unconditional support (Denise & Theiss 298). Since, they always act as a team especially when trying to resolve a predicament affecting one member whereby he or she could not have managed to solve it singlehandedly (Denise & Theiss 298-299). Therefore, communication is an essential tool meant to improve and strengthen coexistence in a family system (Hepworth 255).

Has information from behavioral science improved or only served to complicate matters in parenting?

Behavioral science information has significantly enabled parents provide effective parenting to their children. Since, its core purpose entails equipping them and older children with adequate knowledge meant to interpret diverse behaviors characterizing their immediate members. This is especially by scrutinizing their behaviors and ascertaining what they could be experiencing (Beaver & Kristy 114). Since, some members owing to their physical conditions or other incapacities might not be in a position to express their feelings well. Therefore, through behavioral science information, a parent or an older child is capable of learning what an immediate family member is experiencing and undertake the necessary measures (Beaver & Kristy 114). Measures meant to tackle numerous behavioral predicaments encompass altering an individual's settings. These settings range from social to physical interactions though the latter aspect one can regulate and shun its influences (Beaver & Kristy 114). Therefore, behavioral science knowledge does not complicate parenting, but aids parents care for their children and live harmoniously with their spouses (Beaver & Kristy 114).
