This requires various security measures such as stable supervision of the nation, the composition of their associations, many problems, the issuance of identity documents. If people can blame some of these measures, they are obligatory to defend the nation, broaden its convictions and get rid of rebels and their political agents. These political agents are essential to the insurrection because their associations of opinions are very important in the formation and conscription of the followers of the origin. Only then, after the insurgents were driven out of the area and their political individuals were uprooted, it is likely that locals believed in a return of the insurgents. Winning the hearts and minds of people is also vital.

If it is true that eventually the population will help the government if it seems that it will eventually prevail in the conflict, there is no better substitute for effective anti-insurrectional opposition than having people support you voluntarily. While full support of the population is impossible, it is possible to obtain sufficient support to guarantee victory as well as to marginalize the supporters of the rebellion. Supporting people requires sincere effort to listen and complain. Needless to say, intelligent rebels have promised to respond to public complaints, and if the government is able to anticipate the prospect of guerrillas and implement the necessary reforms, it will lose legitimacy, as the British promised. Independence from Malaysia destroyed the reason for the Malaysian communist party during the emergency in Malaysia. Although the government can not eliminate the legitimacy of an uprising by lifting the cause, it can still win people. Rebels will be very vulnerable when supported internally and externally. Not only are they lacking weapons, human strength and materials, but they also have two of the greatest benefits of shelter and shelter.

This can only be done if the government has suppressed corruption and incompetence in its own ranks, and has made an honest attempt to improve the life of the subject and to respect its beliefs. Likewise, authoritarian reactions that cause heavy civilian casualties and abuses by the military can not be forgiven. If people see that the government really is interested in prosperity and can protect them against rebellious reprisals, their support will be won and the rebels will be isolated. The other way to suppress an uprising is to cut off its external support.

As stated above, the insurgents are taken to the military primarily by relying on the indigenous people; usually the most valuable weapons and equipment from foreign countries. Usually this is also true for neighboring countries, but the material can also be shipped from the sea and the air. Without this support, most of the insurgents do not talk about the formation of conventional powers to overthrow the government, but they can not continue effective guerrilla warfare. Enemy borders, coastal zones and the airspace of the country to prevent materials from reaching rebel. The best example of closing a border is perhaps the "Morice line" established by the French on the border of Algeria and Tunisia, Cezayir F. L. N. It must be supplied by Tunisia.

This line covered most of the border, including minefields and electric barbed wire, and was constantly patrolled by French mobile forces. If it is too costly or impractical to close an enemy border, it is better to monitor and continually monitor the border regions and, if possible, to get support from the neighboring country, thus helping the two countries to close the border. Anger. As long as the government has enough ships and airplanes, it must be easy to rub the shores and protect airways. When resistances are taken from internal and external support, they will be extremely vulnerable. Not only will weapons, labor and goods be consumed, but all at once information about two greatest benefits, shelters and anti-rebellious movements will be neutralized. Mao Zedong and the Chinese socialists will not be proficient to effectively hide in the people and be hid in the cities and be captured or harmless without the prop up of the people, or escaped to the remote regions of the nation, because the Asians are abstracted from mutually the indigenous and the outer allies.
