Rheumatoid Arthritis Case Study:

Rheumatoid arthritis is the disease which affects many organs of the human organism but more often joints of the body. The disease is characterized with pain in joints and gradual process which ends with total disability. That means, a patient loses the ability to walk and move his legs and hands and becomes attached to the bed.

When a person notices that the disease starts to develop, she should do her best and try to walk as much as possible, otherwise the joints will be attacked faster and the person will lose her ability to move. The nature of rheumatoid arthritis is still unknown and doctors do not have the idea about its origin and the factors which cause it. The disease can inform about itself after a strong stress, infection or enormous physical activity. There is only one idea which is based on the belief that the disease is the result of a certain infection and if the person has predisposition to it, she will probably suffer from it. So, when the infection attacks the human body, the immune system tries to defeat the infection creating immune complexes which accumulate in joints gradually destroying them. Moreover, rheumatoid arthritis affects human heart and lungs.

In fact the disease causes death because of the enormously bad affect on human kidneys. Unfortunately, the disease can not be cured and the whole process of treatment is aimed at the reduction of the pain and to prolong the life of the patient. Rheumatoid arthritis is a serious problem, because many people suffer from it.
