War of 1812 The War of 1812 involved a military conflict between the British Empire and the forces from the United States. The war became declared in 1812 by the United States due to a number of reasons (O'Neill & Benn, 2011).

Among the reasons that resulted in the given War of 1812 were trade restrictions put on United States by the British Empire. During that time, Britain was at war with France and, therefore, tried to restrict the United States from any trade connections with their enemies (Hickey, 2012). On imposing such trade restrictions with Britain's enemies despite maintaining neutrality in the war between France and Britain, United States felt violated of their rights to trade freely (Childress, 2004).

Another reason that led to the declaration of the war in 1812 emanated from the British offering support to the American Indian tribes during American expansion. The British helped the American Indians in killing some of the Americans. The British hence helped in fueling the tension between the Americans and the Indian tribes (Gilbert & Hook, 2012).

In having known the reasons for the occurrence of the given war of 1812, the war emanating was inevitable. Following the British involvement in restricting the Americans in trading with some of their enemies plus the British supporting the American Indians to go into war with the American settlers somehow sparked a good reason for America to wage war on the British (Hickey, 2012).
