

Reading, writing, and critical thinking

ASSIGN BUSTER

What we write depicts the things that we know and learn which is largely generated by the things which are perceived by our five senses. As a student, I can say that what I write is a product of the things which I ingest. For example, my interest in arts is cultivated through reading magazines and books related to this topic. Thus, in order to show and communicate what I learn, I also often write about arts instead of topics which I do not read and have no idea about. However, I should also emphasize that the things I write about are also much shaped by my skill to think critically.

I should say that I do not always agree with all the things that I read and I believe that my writing mirrors those which I believe in while opposing or even completely eliminating facts and concepts which I find lacking in themselves.