Coming to video this week is Steven Spielberg's solemn epic, "Schindler's List". As Oskar Schindler, a businessman who employed Polish Jews during the Holocaust, Liam Neeson brilliantly portrays a reluctant hero who uses his natural charm to manipulate the Nazis and protect his workers. While Spielberg graphically records both the horrors the Nazis inflicted on the Jews and the awful spiritual wounds they inflicted upon themselves, this masterful film ultimately centers on one businessman who comes to realize that no amount of profit is worth more than a human life. The film so carefully records the senseless and hideous violence of the time it riserises above the shocking to the sublime. “ Schindler’s List” is a portrait of humanity – its villains, its victims, and its solitary heroes.

“ Whoever saves one life, saves the world entire.” — marketing line for the film Poland, 1939. When the Nazi party confiscates a housewares plant from Jewish businessmen, debonair hustler Oskar Schindler agrees to take it over. And with his know-how, Schindler quickly turns it into a successful factory furnishing soldiers on the German front with pots and pans. Inside the plant, Polish Jews labor without pay while Schindler grows wealthy. At the same time, the profiteer forges a close friendship with his Jewish accountant, Itzhak Stern. Schindler’s whole point of view changes, however, when he witnesses a raid on the Jewish ghetto. The opportunistic party member turns into an active resister, and surreptitiously uses his manufacturing plant as a safe haven for over 1, 000 Jews, rescuing them from certain death. But his deft political maneuvers, clever machinations and attempts at subterfuge can’t go on much longer, not in a world penetrated by hate, brutality and unbridled fascism. So he’ll have to think of a more drastic plan...

film," he said. "Schindler's List" was reportedly very difficult to adapt. One writer spent years working on a draft that he never completed. Though the film had a long incubation period— at one point Spielberg had even turned the project over to Martin Scorsese — Spielberg told the tabloids he wasn't mature enough to direct it before now. Apparently Australian director Fred Schepisi, asked Spielberg not to make the film. According to "Entertainment Weekly," Schepisi told Spielberg that his Hollywood studio-style would ruin the film. The film's international cast and crew spent 71 days filming in Krakow, Poland. Spielberg initially tried to film at the Auschwitz-Birkenau death camp, but the World Jewish Congress protested. Spielberg shot directly outside the Camp's gate instead. And he chose black & white film because "as a medium it's a truth serum." "Schindler's List" cost roughly 22 million to produce. First major film role for British actor Ralph Fiennes (pronounced Rafe Fines), born December 22, 1962, in Suffolk, England.
