BUSTER

The paper "Contribution to the University Community" is a delightful example of a personal statement on sociology. If one were to ask any of my friends to describe me they would portray me as a very pleasing, diverse, dynamic, and intelligent person. As a matter of fact, my most distinctive characteristic is the diversity of the experiences that I have. I am a science student who also boasts elegance for the arts. I am a person who has the technical ability and an interest in management. Additionally, I have a passion for moving to different places and understanding the diverse civilizations of the world. All these fundamentals give me a very extensive outlook, with varying degrees of information and knowledge in a variety of topics. I have a strong belief that while some may not be related directly, all these qualities will control my personal, professional, and overall contribution to the university community. My degree in engineering has had a strong base for my analytical and problem-solving skills because civil designing deals with long, intricate, and complex sums as well as the application of basic mathematics skills. I have worked as a part-time employee in my family firm over the past four years. I am also the co-founder member of the Environmental Club at the university. As a professional in my field, I was involved in the installation of the Enterprise Resource Planning system at a company. Apart from what I have learned at school and college, these personal experiences are the ones that have made me the person that I am. In addition to that, I am of the belief that this distinctive blend of experiences has made me a person of high integrity and with an original point of view. This blend has made to have a fine understanding and a big perspective of life and a target to aim for. My contribution to the university has been immense.
